

We Need Not Walk Alone

Adapted from writings by Mitch Carmody

By most accounts the loss of a child tops the charts in stressful events. Society is missing the boat in understanding the depth and duration of living with that loss. We do not fit into any social set of mores that describes our grief journey adequately.

Whether a child dies from a premature birth or at age 58, there will be parents whose lives are changed forever. If you know of someone who has had removed, a precious child from their arms, show them you care. It is the camaraderie of compassion that we share in learning to accept the unacceptable that enables us to survive. We need not walk alone.
